From the King of Prussia's Head Quarters at Leubnitz near Dresden, July the 23d.

The Batteries being compleated, began to play upon the Town the 18th; and as they were very near the Works, and even upon the Edge of the Ditch, some of the Bombs set Fire to the Houses near the Ramparts, which it was difficult to prevent, though the King had expresly ordered that the Artillery should not act against the Town, but against the Ramparts only. The Fire however would not have become general, if our Engineers had not perceived, that there were four Pieces of Cannon on the Steeple of the Church de la Croix, which fired on our Batteries; to silence which, we were obliged to throw some Bombs, which set fire to the Steeple, the Fall whereof communicated the Flames to the neighbouring Houses, and a violent Wind arising, spread the Fire so far, that a considerable Part of the City has been consumed. The Castle however, the Arsenal, the Church, the Roman Catholicks, and the greatest Part of the Town, have been preserved.

On the 19th, the Day on which the Fire began in the Town, Marshal Daun appeared again with his Army, which he had strengthened by great Detachments, drawn from the Corps under Laudohn and Beck. He encamped between the Villages Schoenfeld and Weissig, at a League's Distance from Dresden. As, after the Return of the grand Army of the Austrians, the Prince of Holstein, who occupied the Posts of Nauendorff and Weisse-Hirsch, with a detached Corps, in order to block up the Town on the other Side of the River, would have been surrounded by the superior Numbers of the Enemy, the King ordered him to pass the Elbe. Marshal Daun having by this Means a free Communication with Dresden, Dreſden, and being come with his Army to encamp, at the Place called the Granges; and having alſo cauſed two Bridges of Boats to be built over the Elbe; and conſequently there being no farther Hopes of ſucceeding in this Siege, the King reſolved, on the 21ſt, to raiſe it.

In the Night, between the 21ſt and 22d, Marſhal Daun threw ſixteen Battalions into the Town, which, at Three o'Clock in the Morning made a general Sally on the Beſiegers, being deſirous, with a manifeſt Intent, of getting Poſſeſſion of our Cannon; but in this they failed. At firſt indeed they carried off ſome Piquets of the Regiment of Anhalt-Bernbourg, but were ſoon vigorouſly repulſed, and purſued even to the Town, with the Loſs of 1000 Men. On this Occaſion we have made 200 Priſoners, amongſt whom is General Nugent, and ſeveral Officers, without the Loſs of a ſingle Piece of Cannon.

After withdrawing all the Artillery from the Siege, the Head Quarters were removed Yeſterday from Gruna to Leubnitz, and our Army encamps here. However, we ſtill occupy the Suburbs of Pirna, the grand Garden; and the Camp of Plauen. General Laſcy is ſtill encamped between Gros-Sedlitz and Dohna; the Army of the Empire behind Maxen, and Marſhal Daun at the Granges, on the other Side the Elbe.

Magdebourg, July 26. By the laſt Accounts, from Sileſia, of the 20th Inſtant, we are informed that General Laudohn remained about Jawer and Landſhut, and that the Town of Glatz was ſtill blocked up. We hear from Glogau, that a Detachment of the Garriſon of that Place had ſurpriſed and taken near Lubben, an Auſtrian Poſt, conſiſting of a Major, two Captains, two Lieutenants, 65 Foot Soldiers, and 15 Troopers of the Regiment of Lowenſtein.

By the laſt Letters from his Royal Highneſs Prince Henry of Pruſſia, his Army was then encamped at Gleiſſen near Konigſwalde; and a ſeparate Corps, under the Command of General Goltz, occupied the Poſt of Meſeritz, which he had obliged General Tottleben to abandon with Loſs.

Prince Ferdinand's Head Quarters at Sachſenhauſen, July 21, 1760.

We have received the following authentick Relation of the Action near Emſdorff of the 16th Inſtant, between the Troops under the Command of the Hereditary Prince of Brunſwick, and thoſe of the Enemy under Major General de Glaubitz.

Upon Advice that a Detachment of the Enemy, conſiſting of ſix Battalions, and of the Regiment of Bertchini, under the Command of Major General de Glaubitz, was advancing towards Ziegenhayn, and was actually encamped at Waſberg; his Serene Highneſs the Hereditary Prince was detached from Saxenhauſen the 14th at Night, for Fritzlar, towards which Place ſix Battalions of the Army had already filed off. He marched early the next Morning to Zweſten, where General Luckner with his Regiment of Huſſars, as alſo Elliot's Regiment of Light Dragoons (that were juſt arrived) joined him. They continued their March, and arrived that Evening at Treyſa; but M. de Glaubitz had already marched from Waſberg and encamped at Emſdorff. Our Troops being fatigued, paſſed the Night at Treyſa, and marched the 16th to Speckwinkel, where Major Fridiricks was poſted with his Chaſſeurs, and to which Place Colonel Freytag had advanced with one of his Brigades: Our Infantry did not arrive till Eleven in the Morning. The Hereditary Prince himſelf went forward and reconnoitred the Enemy's Poſition, and found their Camp placed at the Opening of the Mountains, with their Left extending to a Wood before Emſdorff, with the Village of Erxdorff before their Right; he took with him five Battalions, placed the Foot-Chaſſeurs, and a Brigade of the Chaſſeurs on Horſeback at the Head as an advanced Guard, and made a Detour of near two Leagues acroſs the Woods, Mountains, and the Village of Wolsſkuler, in order to gain the Left Flank of the Enemy, who thinking themſelves very ſecure, were ſurprized in their Camp, and had only Time to place two Battalions upon their Flank; but theſe, after the firſt Attack made upon them by the Chaſſeurs, were routed by the ſecond Regiment of Heſſian Guards, the Colonel of which, M. Naurodt, was wounded at the firſt Diſcharge. Four Pieces of Cannon played from the Wood upon the Camp, and the five Battalions immediately drew out, and wheeling about, puſhed the Enemy, who had ſcarce formed themſelves behind their Camp. While this paſſed, General Luckner, whom the Prince had left in a Bottom before Speckwinkel with the Cavalry, and a Battalion of Bahr, (Hanoverian) got up the Heighths upon the firſt Firing, and attacked the Right of the Enemy, (where M. de Glaubitz had placed Berchini's Regiment) and received a general Diſcharge from all the Muſketry of thoſe that could get to their Arms, as well from the Artillery that was ready to play. The Enemy was put to Flight, and paſſed a Wood which was behind them; the Rear Guard only ſhewing ſome Appearance of Reſiſtance. All their Baggage, Artillery, and Tents, were taken. They retired by Langenſtein, to which Place Barh's Battalion purſued them. From thence having thrown themſelves into another Wood, the ſame Battalion paſſed thro' Langenſtein, and poſted themſelves upon the Stone Bridge that is over the River Ohme. During this Time, the Cavalry had got up to our Right, and keeping cloſe to the Side of the Enemy, had cut them off from the Road that leads to Amænebourg; and it being impoſſible for our Infantry to follow them, the Hereditary Prince took with him the Regiment of Elliot's Light Dragoons, got together ſome Huſſars, and paſſed in Purſuit of them in the Wood, which they had reached on the other Side of the Ohme; and finding them again on their March in the Plain, in their Way to Neiderkleyn, he charged and broke through them four or five different Times; at laſt ſeparated 500 Men from the Body, ſurrounded them, and obliged them to lay down their Arms. Not ſatisfied with this, he marched againſt the Remainder of the Enemy's Infantry, which had thrown itſelf into Neider-kleyn, and had fixed themſelves near a Wood, ſurrounded them, and ſummoned them to ſurrender, which was accordingly done. Berchini's Regiment was likewiſe either entirely taken, or cut to Pieces, by Luckner's Huſſars. Among the Priſoners of the greateſt Note, are Major-General Glaubitz himſelf, and the Prince of Anhalt, who is a Brigadier; Count Helffenberg and Count Muſchinſki were killed by the ſame Cannon Ball. On our Side, the brave Colonel Freytag was dangerouſly wounded; M. Derenthal, Prince Ferdinand's Aid-de-Camp, received a ſhot in his Thigh; M. Walmſden, Major of Brigade, had his Horſe killed under him, and M. Normand, Major General Bahr's Aid-de-Camp, had his Head taken off by the laſt Cannon Shot that the Enemy fired. Our Loſs has, upon the Whole, not been very conſiderable. Our Trophies are Nine Pair of Colours, (almoſt all of which we owe to the Intrepidity of Elliott's Regiment, which, for its firſt Appearance in the Field, has done Wonders) Five Pieces of Artillery, and a Hautzbitzer. Major-General Bahr, and M. de Biſchauſen had the Honour to command the Infantry under the Prince's Orders, which ſhewed throughout the Whole, as much Courage as Good-Will to march on and engage, though harraſſed and almoſt exhauſted by the Fatigues of their March.
